AMST 101

This course examines the United States and the country's connections to the broader world. By exploring ideas about social class, economics, citizenship, food, race, health, gender, music, sexuality, immigration, sports, war, art, nationalism, and freedom, the course takes a comparative and critical approach to the question: "what is America, and American, in an increasingly global world?" Students in this course will spend time thinking and writing about their place in an interconnected and constantly evolving world.

This course fulfills the Written Communication (WC) of the University Core Curriculum

Ryan Schnurr
Joseph Morrison